

MAKEUP AND COSMETOLOGY

If you're passionate about fashion and style, chances are you've considered a career as a makeup artist and also a career as a cosmetologist. The two jobs have some similarities, but they require different training, and they present very different professional opportunities. So which is right for you?

The makeup industry is one that will continue to grow and so will the demand for professionals who specialize in makeup. Those who are passionate about making people beautiful can definitely make a career out of it. There are a lot of things to learn about to become a good makeup artist. You would need to develop and master the art of giving a flawless look to brides, corporate women and others in general. There are various beauty and makeup classes offered by beauty schools and colleges and you can definitely enrol in them for a course in cosmetology.

In every state in the United States, you need a license to become a cosmetologist. You need to go to a school that is recognized by the state, complete a training program that lasts a particular number of hours, then take a test to get your license. After all that, you can go out and get a job as a cosmetologist.

makeup artists may require one—permanent makeup is the application of colors or dyes on the skin that last for an extended period of time—
